Addressing Violence against Children in Eight Cities across the World

Lessons Learned from the EBLS Foundational Study

In the 2030 Sustainable Development Goals, the United Nations have called on the global community to end child abuse, exploitation and all forms of violence, and to promote children's mental health and well-being. The "Evidence for Better Lives" Study (EBLS) is our response to this challenge. Its vision is a global network of academics, stakeholders and policymakers that are committed to addressing violence against children.

Evidence for Better Lives comprises three lines of work: a ground-breaking birth cohort study in eight cities in middle-income countries, which will follow the development of 12,000 children from before they are born; an impact strategy aiming to strengthen evidence-based policies that can help to better address violence against children; a capacity building approach that promotes mutual learning across sites while supporting the development of early career academics.

The Symposium aims to bring together academics and stakeholders to discuss core findings from the foundational stage of EBLS and to examine implications for the wider global agenda of addressing violence against children. We will present conclusions based on a needs and resources assessment conducted in the eight study sites, as well as emerging results of the foundational study on exposure to violence and well-being of pregnant women and their unborn child. We will also examine the lessons learned from the current foundational research for the future main study.

This one-day Symposium at Jesus College, Cambridge, will include around 40 experts, stakeholders and academics from all study sites. It will comprise world-leading researchers on child development and violence against children, as well as representatives from international organisations that lead the global policy field of addressing violence against children.
